Summary of reasons for decision:

The image is a selfie of naked teenage boy. Its availability is likely to be injurious to the public good. There is potential for harm in allowing this image to be shared among those who have a salacious interest in images of nude teenage boys. However, the Classification Office notes that nude or partially nude selfies taken by children or young people are now ubiquitous in this era of camera phones and social media – existing as an avenue of self-expression. Criminalising children or young people for this activity by making such images objectionable is not the intention of the Classification Office. Such a classification would not best serve the wider public good. This image appears to have been taken by and for the use of its subject for an undisclosed purpose. Although the image can be considered objectionable because of the high degree to which it exploits the boy's nudity, the Classification Office considers that this would be unreasonable as it would criminalise its young subject. The only reasonable outcome is to restrict the availability of the image to its subject. This classification will, without criminalising the boy for possessing an image of himself, mean that any other person in possession of this image is in breach of that restriction. In a Bill of Rights framework this classification is reasonable and justified in that it reflects parliament's concern to protect young people from exploitation and also takes into account the subject's right to freedom of expression. The Classification Office notes that if the picture were to be submitted in a different context it may well receive a different classification.
